7. Summary Description:

The Second Union School sits on the east side of Hadensville Fife Road, Rt. 606, adjacent to the Second Union Baptist Church in the western part of Goochland County, Virginia. Constructed in 1918, the building is a one-story, two-room, weather boarded school with a hipped slate roof set on a foundation of 18 concrete piers. A small projecting gable-roofed central section is placed on the front, or west side, of the building and separates a pair of single doors. The school was built using funds from the Julius Rosenwald Fund, while the Fund was in its early years and still based at Tuskegee Institute. The school was probably built using plans and specifications for a two-teacher school developed by the Fund and published in The Rural Negro School and Its Relation to the Community.

Detailed Description

The Second Union School is a one-story, two-room, two-teacher-plan school adjacent to the Second Union Baptist Church. A central projecting section on the façade (west side) of the one-story weather boarded building features a pedimented gable with tongue and groove siding and a semi-circular vent. The front of the projecting section has paired two-over-two double-hung sash windows. Each end of the building has large paired two-over-two double-hung sash windows. There are two groups of three large two-over-two double-hung sash windows in the rear or east side of the building. A brick interior chimney is centered on the rear wall. The main building measures 24 by 48 feet. The small, projecting section measures 5 x 12 feet. The school is in fair to good structural condition; the church replaced the roof and has kept the building in good repair. The school is entered through one of two doors set on either side of the projecting section on the facade. Each door is sheltered by a small hipped-roof porch supported by one square post and approached by a set of three brick steps.

The primary interior space at Second Union School is divided into two rooms. One door opens into the room originally used for the primary grades. The other door opens into the room used for the upper grades. At one time, wooden folding doors (no longer extant) separated the classrooms. All the floors, walls and windows are original to the building. All interior walls are covered with diagonal pine boards; the ceilings are covered with horizontal pine boards. The floor is pine and is in good condition; it has been covered by blocks of linoleum tiles. Original chalkboards are still intact in both rooms. One of the chalkboards was hung nearer to the floor in order to accommodate the younger, primary, students. The interior was heated with a single wood-burning stove (no longer extant) which was ventilated through the central brick chimney which has been boxed in on the interior.

The building stands much as it did in 1918 with no heat and no plumbing. Electricity was added to the school in the 1930s. The original light fixtures are still in place. The two outhouses, or privies, one for girls and one for boys, which stood to the south of the building, have been demolished. The building is currently being used as storage for the church. Plans to expand the church's parking lot originally called for the demolition of the building, but church members, recognizing the significance of the school building and its association with early education for African Americans in Virginia now wish to preserve it.

Second Union School exhibits many of the typical features of Rosenwald school design. Because mandatory construction standards had to be met to receive Rosenwald funding, building plans were published as early as 1915 in The Rural Negro School and Its Relation to the Community. Plans were provided for one-teacher, two-teacher and larger schools, as well as privies and teachers' homes. By 1920 the Rosenwald Fund was being administered from a new office in Nashville and new designs, created by Samuel L. Smith, were first published in book form as Community School Plans in 1924. Since the Second Union School dates to 1918, it was probably developed in conformance with earlier designs developed by Tuskegee Institute.

Plans for Rosenwald schools generally feature minimal Craftsman detailing including overhanging eaves, exposed brackets, hipped or gable roofs with interior chimneys and bands of double-hung sash windows to provide maximum light. On the interior, the plans called for classrooms with small cloakrooms and an industrial room. The plans for two-teacher schools include a movable partition between classrooms so that the space could be used for a meeting room or auditorium. Second Union School retains many of the features commonly associated with Rosenwald plans, including the modest wood frame construction, its east-west orientation and the banks of large windows to provide maximum light to the classrooms.

Summary Statement of Significance

Education for the African American population was first provided on a separate and unequal basis in Virginia. The earliest schools after the Civil War were taught in old or inadequate buildings by black teachers. In the second decade of the twentieth century black children were assisted in their educational endeavors by the philanthropic efforts of a northern foundation. In 1917, Julius Rosenwald, president of Sears Roebuck and Company, established the Julius Rosenwald Fund as a way to improve education for African Americans. In Virginia 367 schools were assisted with Rosenwald funds. As many as ten Rosenwald schools were built in Goochland. Rosenwald was influenced by the work of Booker T. Washington at Tuskegee Institute and that institution directed the efforts of the Fund until 1920 when a separate office was established in Nashville. The Foundation provided matching funds and school building plans. Construction figures for the years 1917 – 1920 are combined as the Tuskegee records did not record school construction by year. Records from the Goochland County School Board and the Virginia State Department of Education list four schools that were built during the 1917 – 1920 budget year using Rosenwald funds: Chapel Hill School, Goochland School, Manakin School, and Second Union School. Built in 1918 under the Rosenwald plan, Second Union School is a well preserved example of the kinds of rural schools built regionally in the early twentieth century. It is the oldest surviving Rosenwald school building in Goochland County. Second Union school stands on its original site with no structural changes made to the building. Chapel Hill School and Manakin School have both been converted for use as houses, the latter with major changes to its structure. Goochland School has been converted to a utility building for Goochland County.

Criteria Statement:

As one of best preserved of the schools constructed in Goochland County using Rosenwald funds, the Second Union School meets Criterion A with significance in the areas of black ethnic heritage and education and meets Criterion C with architectural significance. The period of significance starts with the date the land was sold to the Byrd school district, 1917, and continues until the fifty-year cut-off date, 1955. Second Union School meets the criteria for registration set out in the Rosenwald Schools in Virginia Multiple Property Documentation form. It was built between 1917 and 1932 using funds provided by the Julius Rosenwald Fund. The school's design, floor plan, workmanship and materials are typical of Rosenwald schools and Second Union School retains a high degree of architectural integrity. The school remains in a rural setting.

Historical Background

Second Union School was built on land formerly owned by S. B. Massie and his brother Matthew Massie, inherited from their mother, Lucy Fleming. The Massie parcel contained 49 2/5 acres and was located near "Second Union Colored Baptist Church." On July 5, 1917, S. B. Massie sold a piece of his property to the Byrd school district "adjoining the land now owned by the said Byrd District ... on which is located Public School No. 6 (Second Union) ... containing two acres." It would appear that a school was in place at the time of this purchase. The school board records are sketchy as to the existence of a school on the site but it is speculated that in 1917, the school may have been held in the church.

The Second Union School was built in 1918 at a total cost of $2,000. Of that total, the African-American contribution was $150, the public contribution was $1,800, and the Rosenwald Fund contribution was $50. Terms of the Rosenwald Fund required that public and/or private funds be raised in an amount at least equal to the amount of the Fund's contribution.

Rosenwald funds assisted 367 schools in Virginia in 79 localities. Fifty percent of those constructed in Virginia were, like Second Union School, of the two-teacher type. In the south, 5,358 Rosenwald schools were constructed, improving classroom conditions for over 648,000 African-American students, and providing educational opportunities for generations. Rosenwald schools were often sites for pageants, exhibits, theatricals and other community activities and they often set the standard for the surrounding area with regard to architecture, sanitation and maintenance. Rosenwald schools in Virginia and the south are the tangible reminders of the Fund's initiatives for the advancement of African-American education during the first half of the twentieth century.

Second Union school played a major role in the Fife/Bula community during the time it served as a school and for a time thereafter. The school was used to educate children until 1959 when students were transferred to an integrated elementary school about a mile away. It was at this time that Goochland County sold the building to the trustees of Second Union Church for $900 dollars. The Church had very little to do with the administration of the school except for the influence it brought to bear on the parents of children who were truant or not performing to the best of their ability.

School board records for black schools in Goochland County during the 1920s and 1930s are not available at this time, although efforts are under way to recover them. What is known about

Second Union School is available in oral history accounts drawn from the strong memories of former students, some of whom still live in the community.

William Henson attended Second Union School in the 1940s. He remembers the school as having about 20 children in grades 1 through 3 and around 30 in grades 4 through 7. He vividly remembers certain teachers. Fannie Beale was his primary teacher and the principal of the school. Other teachers from that era included Marett Burnett, Mabel Washington, and Zippo Taylor. Julia

Giles Price remembers "the kids who arrived first at the school were responsible for making a fire so it was always warm when we got there. Those were some of the better years for me. We were not deprived-or we didn't know it if we were. ...we have all grown, matured, and been successful."

Lois Henley, a public health nurse during the early 1950s, went every spring "with Dr. Blakey, an elderly doctor from the Pea Ridge area, to hold a preschool clinic at the school. The bus would bring the little preschoolers and their mothers or grandmothers to get immunized and examined by the doctor. Space was limited and we often used the front office or worked behind a screen. Everyone had a great day except for the little ones at 'shot time'. The older students enjoyed the excitement."

Calvin Hopkins, who attended Second Union when it closed in 1959, remembers loving school and how much the teachers seemed to care about the students. He does not have fond memories of the heating system, however. "If you sat too near the stove you were too warm and sitting too far away meant you stayed cold most of the morning."

Second Union Church used the school for Sunday school and Bible school classes. When the church built a new Fellowship Hall, the school building became a place for storage. The Second Union Church community, the Goochland Historical Society, and Goochland County administrators are committed to restoring this building and creating a museum for Black History in Goochland with a particular emphasis on education.
